Description of activities

Something creative

As part of the Move 4 Human Rights Summer Edition, apart from the fixed programme which includes workshops and sessions with experts from the human rights field, participants are asked to develop, organize and implement their own collaborative projects. Those who chose the Justice & Peace trajectory, were asked to contribute to a more welcoming society for newcomers. Victor Johnson and the group chose to celebrate and highlight the people and communities that shape The Hague's cultural landscape. By visually telling the stories of different businesses with diverse cultural markers, they highlighted the richness migration brings to the city. In this way, the group creatively and physically gave space to an alternative narrative on migration.

Talent development

Professional development

Through interactive workshops, field visits, and collaborative projects, the Move 4 Human Rights Summer Edition provides a space for its participants in which human rights theory meets practice. Participants have not only learned more about pressing human rights issues (inter)nationally, they have also contributed to impactful solutions. After completing the programme they have deepened their understanding of the field, gained hands-on experience, and contributed to a network of like-minded changemakers.

Social impact

Helped the organisation where the participant did his/her MDT

With their project, the participants have actively contributed to the migration and human rights programme of Justice & Peace. After getting to know the organization and the programme, the participant has successfully translated the programme goals into a feasible, practical, and creative project within the timespan of two weeks. These projects have contributed to counter or alternative narratives on migration, either focused upon the general public and/or creating tools specifically for those who are coming new to the Netherlands.

Meaningful encounters

People from the working field

Within the Move 4 Human Rights Summer Edition, participants have not only met different experts from the human rights field such as professionals, local human rights defenders, or partnering organizations. They have also made an effort within their own projects to reach out to the general public and the participants within their projects. Additionally they showed their final work to experts, policy makers, and educators during the final presentations.
